ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This publication would not have been possible without the financial support of the Permanent Mission of the Kingdom of the Netherlands to the United Nations. Our suggestion to the Mission that a balanced and comprehensive look at the role that the Group of 77 (G-77) commands in the UN General Assembly seemed long overdue was fortunately met with a positive response in late 2009. That the Mission did not seek to influence our observations out of respect for the independence of NGOs was also appreciated.

We are very grateful that so many diplomats and experts from both the South and North were willing to sit down with us—often for hours—to clarify various aspects of UN negotiations and in particular to share their observations about the role of the G-77. Any instinctive wariness they may have felt towards NGO scrutiny seemed to be trumped by a genuine willingness to explain stances and shed light on negotiations. Their patience and surprising candor often felt humbling and exhilarating at the same time. Humbling because we came to realize that many NGOs like us probably do not understand as much about UN negotiations as we often assume—in part because we usually are not privy to the bulk of the discussion. However, the many glimpses of insider observations and concerns were therefore both fascinating and enlightening. Following publication, we plan an exchange of ideas and opinions in a panel discussion and we will also update the online version with additional findings, ideas, conclusions, and necessary corrections.

The proximity of Columbia University’s School of International and Public Affairs (SIPA) gave us access to two impressive research assistants. Recent SIPA graduates Paloma Muñoz from Chile and Abdullahi Boru from Kenya provided outstanding research, additional fresh perspectives, as well as fact-checking.

Since its inception in the late 1970s, every publication from the Center for UN Reform Education has greatly benefited from the editing skills of Estelle Perry. She helped make the English of two non-native speakers easier to understand, while also pointing out contradictions and gaps. In addition, she produced an overview of G-77 positions in Appendix II which should be extremely valuable to anyone interested in this influential bloc.
